Catalog specifications

Using these specifications to choose a product

This is a ferrocerium fire-starting rod with a separate multifunction striker, not a tent. The product photographs show the handle, rod, striker and retaining cord. Keep those components together in the sample description. Ask for the selected rod's dimensions and the instructions supplied with it when planning the retail pack; the image alone does not establish ignition performance or service life.

Keep sleeping equipment and campsite accessories in clearly named order lines. A sleeping bag, inflatable mattress, peg and guylines solve different problems, even when sold in one outdoor range. Define what the customer receives with each item and which components are separate. For a sleep product, list the intended space, packed format and included items. For an anchoring accessory, record its stated dimensions, construction and quantity basis. Do not turn the number of accessories visible in a photograph into a pack quantity. A sample checklist should identify each component by name so missing pieces can be discussed before a bulk quotation is accepted.

Compare like-for-like information before making a range decision. Mattress dimensions are not sleeping-bag dimensions; a fabric designation is not a temperature rating; a peg length is not a holding-force result. If products are intended to be used together, document the required fit or connection instead of assuming compatibility. In the sample review, separate visible construction checks from tests that need a defined method. Keep the record practical: selected version, measurements to inspect, component count, packing arrangement and instructions required by the buyer. Attach that checklist to the product reference, then agree the commercial terms for the chosen configuration.
